Tales of Well Known Folk In Social and Official Life

President and Mrs. Harding's Visit to Marion
During Homecoming Week Important
Episode in Life of City.

President and Mrs. Harding's visit to Marion during homecoming week will be an important episode in the municipal history of that now famous little city and White Oaks, the prosperous farm of Gen. Sawyer, on the outskirts, will pass into the annals as having served as a temporary White House. Marion's celebration is one of the many projected all over Ohio, and which include many historic anniversaries, as well as civic milestones. Ohio, the sonorous Indian word, which means a beautiful river, dates her history back to the formation of the colony on Laramie's creek, in Shelby county, to 1749, and while the Pacific coast will be celebrating the centenary of the great heira, across the plains in search of gold, Ohio will mark the two-hundredth of her existence.

Nearly all of Ohio has celebrated a centennial and next year some of the older cities, Marietta, Cleveland, Columbus, Gallipolis, Franklin, Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton, will hold special exercises to mark the passing of the 125th year of their municipal history. All of these and several more were incorporated as thriving local communities as time will permit.

The President takes the keenest interest in history of every variety, and that which concerns his home state makes a special appeal and he is prepared to appear at an array of these local celebrations as time will permit. It is a happy juncture of affairs which has brought Mrs. Taft to Marion during the residence of her devoted friend and after-time companion in travel, Mrs. Post Wheeler. When the Chief Justice was sent by President McKinley to be governor general of the Philippines the acquaintance began and has ripened into the deepest attachment. Mrs. Taft and Miss Wheeler were then—made many fascinating excursions together into the byways of travel, especially to Europe, where they made a long excursion into Siberia and were among the first passengers on the Russian-Siberian railroad, which has such an extensive history in diplomacy. But the trip which stands out above all others was that one day in Paris, in which they slipped away from the official party, of which Judge Taft was chief, and taking as fast a train as Europe could boast about 1903, arrived in the French capital about 8 o'clock in the morning, and the next day, messengers prepared the great designers and milliners of their desire to shop quickly and just what they wanted. They began about 9:30 to look over wraps, for day and evening wear, and in an hour had purchased for a year in that line. Then came gowns, which consumed two more hours, then the accessories, which every well informed woman knows can be gotten only in Paris, took another hour, and hats, gloves, hosiery and lingerie were purchased until about 6 o'clock when, tired, but content, they caught a train to Havre and joined the other portion of the party in time for the steamer's sailing. Both ladies were entirely satisfied with the result of that day, and Mrs. Taft often boasted that in that rapid work she had solved the problem of raiment, winter and summer, for a full year.

Queen Mary of Britain is as familiar to the public in the flesh and by the camera, in her neat, close-fitting turban, as her august mother-in-law, Queen Victoria, was for her wide, high bonnets, and rich robes, and beneath her ample chin. When King George and his consort appeared a few weeks ago at the Drury Lane Theater to honor Sir Harry Lauder's first appearance after a lengthy sojourn in foreign parts, the audience was at first uncertain about the identity of the lady in the high hat, made with Russian headress effect and of generous proportions, and it required a minute's scrutiny before the queen was recognized. It was instantly decided that the change was impressive and becoming and, through medium of the court circular, issued the next morning, an interested public learned that the new shaped hat was of silver gray, with the high, broad brim, and simply of elaborate trimming, according to the occasion. For, as she formerly possessed the loosely wound turban in every sort of material, so the turban now is of straw, of flowers or Milan weave, trimmed in flowers for informal wear or cloth of gold and silver or iridescent beads with costly fashions for state occasions.

With a well established reputation for globe trotting, the American woman has now lost the championship in that line, and, according to the opinion of the Royal Geographical Society of London, with which the various American organizations are affiliated, the most traveled woman of today is Mrs. Charlotte Cameron of Edinburgh, who has just returned from a protracted sojourn in the South Sea Islands and has added her quota to the rapidly increasing literature embracing that part of the world. In 1910 Mrs. Cameron covered 10,000 in South Africa, and the following year she continued her explorations of the dark continent, completely circumnavigating it and penetrating portions hitherto unknown either to scientists or travelers for pleasure. During the years when other parts of the world were shut off because of the war, Mrs. Cameron spent much time profitably in Alaska and the mainland to the west. For three years past she has been in the southern hemisphere, both South America and the vast continent of Australasia. Her two books on the South Sea Islands are declared to add much to the fine volumes of the American author, Frederick O'Brien.

American art collectors are awake to the alarm felt throughout Great Britain and the continent because of the wholesale purchasing of renowned treasures and their importation to the western world. Great Britain has recently passed another law, which compels owners of paintings, sculptures, armor, and curios of a certain age and value, to offer them first to the government before seeking alien purchasers. Of course, the British government will not pay the prices which American millionaires offer, and there is much dissatisfaction. Already one fine painting by Sir Thomas Lawrence, called "The Red Boy," narrowly escaped crossing the ocean and joining his famous confrere, "The Blue Boy," now in Gainsborough. The "Red Boy" now hangs in the National Museum in London and has aroused universal admiration. The original was Master Lambton, eldest son of the first Earl of Durham, who died in 1818, and had been until the present Lord Durham determined to part with it, the chief treasure of a fine gallery in Lambton Castle, Surrey. The first Earl of Durham, who collected nearly all of the canvases which are a valuable asset at present, was that great administrator and author on which the present colonial policy of Great Britain is founded. "The Red Boy" is vivid as a cardinal and sits on a scarlet velvet sofa against a dark, mysterious background seen so often in the Lawrence paintings, in which owls' faces and monstrous figures are just discernable. He is in court attire of crimson satin, with a pensive face and dark, brooding eyes. The original was in his tenth year when he sat for the master, and the picture is of haunting beauty.

An illustrious sculptor of Yugoslavia is passing some months in New York, making occasional visits to Washington in the execution of several commissions from the Royal Academy at Belgrade, Serbia. He is M. Alexandre Sambugnac, whose advent in this country was primarily to mold a bust of the former President, Dr. Woodrow Wilson, intended to occupy a special niche in the United States Capitol.
